The lobster was alive, destined for someone's dinner plate. She bought the lobster for $20.23, brought it home, and wondered what to do next. After looking on Google, she realized the lobster most likely came from Nova Scotia, and thought it would be better to return it to the ocean than to keep it in a tank. Loughead posted a message on a Facebook group for vegans in Halifax, looking for someone who could put the lobster back in the ocean if she shipped it to Nova Scotia. Beth Kent of Bridgewater answered the message. She stopped eating meat 35 years ago and is passionate about helping all living beings. Loughead then drove six hours from her home to the UPS store in Winnipeg, which ships live animals. She spent $225 to send the lobster to Halifax, where Kent picked it up. The lobster was packed in a Styrofoam box with cold packs and wet newspaper. Kent said she was relieved to see it was still alive and moving after the 24-hour journey. She drove the lobster to a spot she thought would be a good place to release it into the ocean, but changed her mind when she saw a fishing boat on the horizon. Kent then found a small cove where she thought the lobster would have better chances and put it in the water. "All of a sudden, he straightened out and walked over the rocks," she said. Back in Ontario, Loughead was relieved to hear the lobster completed the long, strange journey. Kent said she was happy to help this lobster. It was this lobster's very lucky day.	2:47

INSTRUCTOR NOTES IF DONE IN CLASSROOM SETTING

If the photo story is done in a classroom environment, instructors should encourage learners to use full sentences, transitional phrases, and connectors where possible.

While learners are taking turns telling their story with a partner, instructors should be walking around the classroom listening to learners and making notes of any errors made and/or support required. This should be reviewed prior to learners telling the story for the second time.

Learners are instructed to read the script. The purpose of this is not to memorize the script but to clarify any details if needed.

If possible, learners should be encouraged to record themselves telling the story the second time so they can listen to themselves and work on developing their fluency for their language level.

An assessment form is included on the following page if instructors wish to use this as an assessment task or as a peer/self-evaluation tool to assess one another or themselves.

Instructors should familiarize themselves with the script and watch the video in advance to doing this story in the classroom.
